THREE NEW EXHIBITIONS: ONE MISSION

Frost Art Museum continues its mission to offer free arts programming to the community with three new spring exhibitions.

MIAMI (January 25, 2020)— The Patricia and Phillip Frost Art Museum FIU reopens its doors to Western Miami, welcoming area culture vultures to peruse and explore three impactful and groundbreaking exhibitions, which celebrate topics like honoring our environment, finding humor in our obsession with technology and celebrating a new way of looking at ethnically diverse neighborhoods.

Transitional Nature: Hudson River School Paintings from the David and Laura Grey Collection (on view through May 17, 2020) features 29 paintings from the New York collection of David and Laura Grey and includes masterpieces by Albert Bierstadt, Robert S. Duncanson, Asher B. Durand, and George Inness. Pretty pictures of beautiful nature landscapes aside, the paintings will allow for you to dive deep into thought about topics which are still very relevant today, including preservation of nature—something we tend to think about daily in Miami.

Liu Shiyuan: Opaque Pollination (on view through April 12, 2020), is this young artist's first solo exhibition at a museum in the United States. Liu's quirky videos, collaged photography, and mixed media work might make you giggle in wonderment and might also beckon you to think about awkward human interactions as a result of our collective obsession with technology and social media. Many of the pieces are stripped of their original context—the artist takes random photos of objects and brilliantly composes a visual symphony that inspires thought and emotion.

Terence Price II: Never Ending Gardens (on view through April 26, 2020) presents 21 photographs and 2 videos that create a visual story about Miami's predominately Black community, Carol City. As a native, Price navigated the hard times, economic change and neglect the city, now called Miami Gardens, experiences. He taught himself photography, studying works by other artists and began to create work that contemplates the idea of community. Price captures intimate relationships formed among family, friends, and neighbors as his photography bears witness to change in his community and documents how individual lives are affected by economic shifts. The exhibition's title refers to his enduring bond with the community and its residents, who raised him and shaped his perspective.
